My love affair with America began with my love of the English language. English was my favourite class after French literature, and I simply adored my English teacher. He spoke English without a French accent. He learned it during World War II, when he found himself in a prisoner-of-war camp with a high school teacher from Weston, Massachusetts. They surely had long hours to practice.

After the war they started an exchange programme for high school students. Each year, one student from the United States comes to our town and one of us goes to Weston. The exchange continues to this day, and the competition is keen.

During my last year at the junior high, I had good grades and I could apply, but I wasn't interested. In the schoolyard, between classes, there was hardly another topic of conversation. Among my friends, the favourite choice was Monique; she wanted it so badly, and besides, she was the best in our class.

But the selection committee did not make a decision on time. Several days later, my English teacher appeared at the door. He came to see my mother, which seemed rather strange, considering my good grades. He left, with a big, satisfied smile but not a word to me except hello. My mother called me. Something was very important.

The selection committee did not find a suitable candidate. My teacher proposed me as an alternative, and the other members agreed. But since I never applied, he had to come and persuade my parents to let me go. And so I went. It was a wonderful year—one of the best of my adolescence—and it certainly changed the course of my entire life.
